

This is in response to Bell South trying to take over all communications in the DSL arena. This would be a travesty if smaller companies like Sonic.net were forced to make changes in operation costs. This would be a burden on small companies that provide internet service. Many would be forced to close their doors. This would hurt jobs and free competition of pricing for DSL service. I have been a customer of Sonic.net for a few years now and after trying the bigger companies I have learned that the overall satisfaction I get from using a company like Sonic.net doesn't compare to what I have experienced with larger ISP's. Customer Service is better for one. Reliability has also been better. Finally the price for the service has been fair. In summary if a company can provide the three things with overall satisfaction to the customer you have a win win situation. Bigger companies don't provide this. Please block this change.
